CHAPTER V AUTOSUGGESTION THE WORK OF THE NANCY AND ROUSSEAU SCHOOLS UR hysteria case must furnish us with yet one more point of departure. We traced and analyzed, step by step, the process and mechanisms which led from a very ordinary domestic scene to a most extraordinary locking of the patients right arm behind his back, and we saw how it was possible to cure him by reawakening memories of a conflict which carried too great an energy-charge for expression through the channels habitually used by the Unconscious. We saw in the rigid arm a steady discharge of both muscular and nervous energy, and unlike all voluntary actions it did not cause proportionate fatigue. This is a most important point. If any of us should attempt to duplicate the patients muscular feat, there would be weariness and numbness. All conscious actions will bring fatigue...
